Introduction

The journal Rural Sociology has completed fifty years of publication. This index to Volumes 1-50 is designed to provide complete references to articles published in the Journal between 1936 and 1985. All subject and author citations used in earlier indices with the exception of obituaries have been retained (see Volumes 20, 30, and 40).

In Volume 30, William Sewell (1955) commented how difficult it is to categorize articles. We have elaborated on Sewell's classification scheme (Christenson and Garkovich, 1985), and all articles have been reviewed by two individuals to provide continuity and consistency in classification. Changes in terminology, focus, and method of sociological writings over the fifty-year period have made a single set of index categories problematic. Our goal has been to make the index useful by uniting writings published throughout the period to concepts and categories suitable today. Thus, our approach has been to provide an extensive listing of subtopics to facilitate an appreciation of the variation within the themes of main topics. Inspection of volume numbers within subtopical sections also reveals the change of foci within main areas over time.

The author index contains 1,782 titles, which represent 1,323 different authors. Only three authors have published more than twenty articles (see Christenson and Coleman, 1985): only fifteen have published more than a dozen articles. Most authors have published in Rural Sociology only once.

The subject index includes 4,915 citations, with 338 main topics, 847 subtopics, and extensive cross references. Overall, most articles have three different entries; however, some appear as many as eight times. All articles are listed at least once. We hope the additional cross listings and subtopics facilitate quick and efficient utilization of this index for your research. We might note that subjects with the most headings include methodology, rural-urban differences, migration, and community, and our attempt has been to break down subjects so that subareas can be quickly identified. Volume 50, Number 4 (Winter) provides a content analysis of the articles with special foci on themes, methods, presidential addresses, and reoccurring issues.

I want to thank Dr. Lorraine Garkovich, who carefully reviewed each article, chose main headings and subtopics, and entered each citation to its category. This index is hers. Ann Stockham provided the logistic coordination of the thousands of entries and copy-edited all listings. Donna Fain carefully typed the subject index. To each of these individuals, we owe a debt of thanks.

Guide to Usage

The fifty-year index is divided into two sections. The first is an author index, which lists in alphabetical order the first author responsible for the contribution. The complete citation is given for the senior author only. Cross references are provided for other contributors. The sequence of a citation is: author, co-author(s) in parentheses, title, volume number, issue and year in parentheses, and page numbers. When an author has contributed more than one publication, articles are listed in alphabetical order by the first word in the title.

The second section is the subject index, and it is intended to serve as a practical desktop tool. The user is encouraged to become familiar with the major topics, which are listed on page 126 with their beginning page numbers. A perusal of these headings and their cross references will provide a quick reference to the classification schema. The subtopics have been arranged alphabetically, and they have been chosen to make your search as discriminate as possible. They are not exhaustive, but they illustrate and clarify categories that have the greatest number of citations to make your search less burdensome. The subject utilizes a code consisting of the last name of the senior author, volume number, issue and year in parentheses, and beginning page number. As a time-saving technique, this style of classification enables the user to look up either the full reference in the author index or go directly to the Journal for the complete article.
